A Night Market Feast for Two

兩人的夜市盛宴

'I'm not hungry,' said Emma as she stepped out of the Jiantan MRT station. Ten minutes later, her appetite had come back in full force. The smell of garlic and ginger drifting from a hundred stalls was impossible to resist. 'Okay,' she admitted, 'maybe I could eat a little.' Wei-chen grinned. 'A little? Tonight you are going to have a feast.'

Their first stop was a stall selling fried chicken cutlets bigger than Emma's face. 'Isn't it greasy?' she asked, watching the cook lift the golden cutlet out of the oil. 'Crispy, not greasy,' Wei-chen corrected her. 'The secret is in the ingredients: sweet potato flour and plenty of white pepper.' Emma took a bite. The outside crackled, and the inside was so juicy that she burned her tongue. 'Worth it,' she mumbled, still chewing.

Next came a mug of cold lemonade, then a plate of oyster omelette covered in sweet red sauce. Emma was less sure about the stinky tofu. 'Is that even edible?' she whispered, holding her nose. 'My grandmother says if you can chew it with your eyes closed, you are officially Taiwanese,' Wei-chen said. She closed her eyes, chewed, and opened them in surprise. 'The flavor is actually... good? Like a strong cheese.' 'Dairy and tofu, same idea,' he laughed.

By ten o'clock they had shared a coconut milkshake, a cucumber salad, and a cup of grass jelly. 'In America we dine at a table,' Emma said, rubbing her stomach. 'Here, the whole street is the table.' 'Now you understand,' Wei-chen replied. 'Same time next week?' She did not even hesitate.
