The Scar on Jason's Elbow

傑森手肘上的疤

Jason had always believed that a few scratches were nothing to worry about. So when he slipped on the wet court during a basketball game last June and scraped his elbow, he simply wiped away the blood with his jersey and kept playing. His coach shouted at him to stop, but Jason, breathing hard and with his chest pounding, wanted to finish the match. By the time the final whistle blew, the wound had stopped bleeding, and he forgot about it.

Three days later, his elbow began to ache. The skin around the cut turned red and hot, and it itched so badly that he could not sleep. His mother took one look at it and marched him to the clinic near the MRT station. The doctor explained that bacteria had entered the wound and caused an infection. 'Germs love dirty basketball courts,' she said, cleaning the cut while Jason made a fist and bit his cheek to keep from crying. She gave him an injection, wrapped the elbow in a thick bandage, and prescribed a dose of antibiotics to be taken twice a day.

The medicine made him drowsy, and for a week he felt exhausted after climbing a single flight of stairs. Worse, he was not allowed to play. Sitting on the bench, Jason finally consulted his coach about what he should have done. 'Wash it, cover it, and let it heal,' the coach said. 'Playing through pain feels brave, but it is actually harmful.'

The wound healed slowly, leaving a pale scar on his elbow. Jason still plays every weekend, but now a small first-aid kit with a few band-aids and a roll of bandage travels in his backpack. When his younger teammates laugh at it, he just rolls up his sleeve and shows them the scar.
