A Day in the Ward: An Interview with Nurse Chen

病房裡的一天：專訪陳護理師

Chen Ya-chi has worked in the surgical ward of a Taipei hospital for twelve years. Last week, our school newspaper visited her to find out what nursing is really like.

Q: What does a typical morning look like? A: It begins at seven with a report from the night shift. Then I check every patient's symptoms: fever, swelling, pain, and how well they slept. Many of them have just had surgery, so the surgeon needs to know immediately if something has changed. After that I hand out pills and vitamins, change dressings, and help patients who are too weak to walk get out of bed. Q: Which patients stay in your memory? A: A man who received a kidney transplant three years ago still sends me a card every Lunar New Year. He had suffered from kidney disease for a decade, and I watched him regain his strength week by week. His recovery was not only physical; the mental side mattered just as much. Patients who believe they will get better usually do.

Q: What is the hardest part of the job? A: Honestly, the physical demand. I walk about fifteen kilometers a day, and by evening my legs are shaking and my uniform is soaked with sweat. The muscles in my back never fully relax. Q: Do you have any advice for teenagers? A: Prevention is cheaper than therapy. Eat real food, not just snacks; nutrition matters more than any pill. Being overweight at fifteen makes your organs work harder at fifty. And please, do not start smoking. I have seen too many lungs that could have been healthy.

Q: Why do you keep doing it? A: Because when a patient who could not breathe on his own walks out of the ward, you feel that your tiredness was worth something. That feeling has not worn out in twelve years.
