Big News from the Front Desk

櫃台傳來的大消息

Dear Kevin, Sorry for the slow reply. Since I started working at the reception desk of a hotel in Tainan's Anping district, my life has become busier than it was during exam season. The hotel has a staff of about sixty, and new employees must complete two weeks of training before they are allowed to greet a single guest. We even attended a workshop on handling angry customers, which turned out to be surprisingly useful.

My supervisor, Ms. Lin, is strict but fair. She has worked in the hotel profession for twenty years, and she expects everyone to look professional at all times, even at six in the morning. Last month she told me I had been the most productive member of the team, and yesterday I was promoted to senior receptionist. The promotion comes with a slightly higher salary and a new mission: managing the night shift twice a week. I am not sure I am qualified yet, but Ms. Lin says that confidence is also a qualification.

Not everything has been cheerful. Our technician, Mr. Chen, who had fixed every broken air conditioner for fifteen years, resigned in August. His resignation surprised the whole staff, because he always said he would never retire. It seems his doctor advised him to find a less tiring occupation. On his last day, he gave a short presentation about the strangest things he had ever repaired, and we laughed until we cried.

Anyway, how is your translator course going? Are you still volunteering at the library on weekends? Write soon and tell me everything. Yours, Vivian
