Diary of a Penghu Summer

澎湖夏日日記

July 12, Sunday. Our family finally began the journey to Penghu that Dad had been promising since Lunar New Year. We left home at five in the morning, dragging two heavy suitcases down the stairs because the elevator was being repaired. At Budai harbor, the ferry terminal was already crowded with tourists checking the timetable on a big screen. Dad had made a reservation online, so we only had to show our ID cards and climb aboard.

The crossing took about ninety minutes. My little brother spent the whole time on the upper deck, pointing at every fishing vessel we passed, while Mom stayed inside because the waves made her dizzy. When we reached the dock in Magong, a shuttle bus was waiting to take us to our hostel. The fare was only fifty dollars, and the driver told us which beaches were worth visiting.

July 13, Monday. Today we rented bikes to explore the island. Wearing helmets in the heat was uncomfortable, but after an hour of pedaling along the coast, I forgot about it. We stopped at a white lighthouse that has guided ships for more than a hundred years. From the top, the sea looked like a sheet of blue glass, and I understood why so many cyclists choose this road.

Tomorrow is our last day, and our main destination is the morning market, where Mom wants to buy dried squid as souvenirs for our neighbors. Dad says the best part of traveling is not the sightseeing but the moments nobody plans. I think he is right. I will never forget the sunset on the deck tonight, with the whole family quiet for once.
