Four Ways to Beat Exam Pressure

戰勝考試壓力的四個方法

Exam week is coming, and if you are like most senior high students in Taiwan, you probably feel the pressure building already. Your shoulders are tense, you lie awake at night, and the thought of the mock test is turning into a nightmare. The good news is that stress itself is not your enemy; too much of it is. Here are four ways to keep it under control.

First, make a plan you can actually follow. Students often panic because the amount of material looks endless. Break each subject into thirty-minute blocks and tick them off one by one. The sense of satisfaction from finishing a block is a stronger motivation than any scary warning from a teacher. Second, protect your sleep. A restless night does more harm than an extra hour of cramming, and a tired brain is a pessimistic brain that sees every question as impossible.

Third, move your body. A twenty-minute walk around the block, a few stretches between chapters, or even dancing to one song will relax muscles that have been tight for hours. Many students report an immediate sense of relief after exercise, and the improved mood usually lasts into the next study session.

Finally, talk to someone. If you feel miserable or find yourself losing your temper over small things, tell a friend, a parent, or a counselor. A sympathetic listener cannot take the exam for you, but sharing a worry often cuts it in half. Remember that your worth is not measured by a single score. Be patient with yourself, treat your mind with the same warmth you would offer a friend, and the pressure will become something you can carry, not something that carries you.
