Diary of a Nervous Violinist

一位緊張小提琴手的日記

Monday, October 6. Our school orchestra has only two weeks left before the autumn concert, and tonight's rehearsal was a disaster. We are playing the second movement of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, which our conductor, Mr. Huang, calls a masterpiece. I know the melody by heart, but when the pianist sped up, I lost the rhythm completely and came in two bars late. Mr. Huang did not yell. He just looked at me, which was worse. On the way home I kept humming the tune on the MRT until a little girl stared at me.

Thursday, October 9. Better today. I rehearsed alone in the small studio behind the music room for an hour before everyone arrived, and this time I counted silently through the hard part. Lily, our best violinist, sat beside me and told me the secret: do not listen to yourself; listen to the cellos. The posters for the performance went up in the hallway this afternoon. My name is on them, in very small letters, but it is there. Grandma says she will come even though she usually only likes opera.

Saturday, October 18. We performed tonight. The hall was full, and in the first verse of the opening piece my hands were shaking so badly that I could barely hold the bow. Then the theme of the second movement began, slow and warm, and somehow I forgot to be afraid. The sound of sixty students playing together felt like one voice. Afterwards, Grandma hugged me and said it was the best lullaby she had ever heard, which made everyone laugh. Mr. Huang finally smiled. I think I will remember that smile longer than the applause.
