Escape from the Flooded Basement

逃出淹水的地下室

I had never seen rain like that before. Typhoon Haikui was approaching Yilan faster than the weather bureau had predicted, and by three in the afternoon the street outside our family's bookstore had turned into a brown river. My father and I were in the basement, attempting to carry boxes of new books upstairs, when the lights went out with a loud bang.

"Leave the books," Dad said. "We're abandoning the basement." But as we climbed, water began to pour down the stairs, and the old wooden shelf beside the entry collapsed, blocking our way. For a second I just stood there, blinking in the dark. Then I heard Dad cough, and I understood that we had to cope with this ourselves. I fastened my phone inside a plastic bag, switched on its light, and crawled under the fallen shelf. The gap was small, and a nail cracked the screen, but I emerged on the other side and started dragging the shelf aside.

Dad could not fit through, so we tried another way. He bent the thin metal pole of a lamp, and I used it to assist him in pushing the shelf while I pulled. The water was now up to my knees, cold and smelling of mud. After several attempts, the shelf shifted just enough, and Dad crept through. We dashed up the last steps and burst into the shop, where my mother was waiting with towels and a very loud voice.

The books in the basement were destroyed, and we spent a week dumping wet paper into trucks. But my father did not look sad. "Possessions can be replaced," he said, adjusting his glasses with a shaking hand. "The important thing is that we encountered the flood together and escaped together." I did not say anything. I just held the towel tighter.
