Survey: Teen Screen Time Reaches Record High

調查：青少年螢幕時間創新高

TAIPEI - The majority of Taiwanese teenagers now spend more than four hours per day on their phones, according to a nationwide survey released on Monday by a youth research center. The survey, which included 3,200 students between the ages of 13 and 18, found that 62 percent of respondents use their phones mainly for short videos and messaging, while a mere 9 percent said they use them mostly for studying. Researchers described the trend as "worldwide," but noted that the rate in Taiwan is relatively high compared with Japan and South Korea.

The report also revealed a widespread shortage of sleep. Nearly half of the students reported sleeping less than seven hours on school nights, and the proportion rose to 58 percent among senior high school students. Multiple factors were mentioned, including homework, cram school schedules, and late-night scrolling. "A slight increase in screen time may not seem serious," said Dr. Huang Shu-fen, who led the study, "but when it is repeated every night, the quantity of lost sleep becomes tremendous."

Not all the news was negative. The percentage of teenagers who said they had tried to reduce their screen time rose from 31 to 44 percent in a series of surveys over the past three years, and various schools have introduced "phone-free" lunch breaks. Students at one junior high school in Kaohsiung ranked among the best sleepers in the survey after their school shortened evening study sessions by thirty minutes. Dr. Huang suggested that parents set a reasonable minimum of eight hours of sleep and keep phones out of the bedroom. "Plenty of teens want to change," she said. "They simply need sufficient support, and a moderate, step-by-step reduction works far better than taking the phone away completely."
