A Night Among the Lanterns of Jiufen

九份燈籠下的夜晚

If you take the bus from Ruifang up the winding mountain road, you will arrive at Jiufen, a historic gold-mining town that seems to hang on the hillside above the sea. During the day, the main street is messy and crowded, but at dusk something magical happens. Red lanterns are lit one after another along the narrow steps, and the whole town begins to glow. The fragrance of taro balls and grilled sausages drifts through the air, and the harsh noise of the day fades into a leisurely hum.

The teahouses are the most impressive feature of the town. Their outer walls are made of dark wood that has been polished by decades of mist, while the inner rooms are filled with oval wooden tables, hidden corners, and windows that frame the magnificent view of the ocean. In one of them, I sat beside a window and watched the fishing boats, their lights scattered like stars on the water. The tea master moved with graceful precision, pouring hot water in a perfectly steady stream. It was a genuine moment of peace, the kind that is hard to find in a city.

Of course, Jiufen is not ideal in every way. The steps are irregular and sometimes inconvenient for older visitors, and on weekends the crowds can be overwhelming. Yet the town's original charm remains obvious. The old buildings are not identical copies of each other; each one has an odd shape that tells its own story. As I walked back down to the bus stop, the lanterns behind me looked like a glorious river of light. Overall, it was a memorable night, and I left with the promising feeling that I would return, perhaps in the mysterious fog of winter, when the town seems to float above the clouds.
