A Letter to Next Year's Seniors

給明年高三生的一封信

Dear students of Class 207, By the time you read this, I will already be a university student elsewhere, and you will be standing where I stood a year ago, with the entrance exam only months away. Your teacher asked me to write to you, and I agreed, despite knowing that advice from a stranger is easily forgotten. Still, I hope a few of these words will be a small contribution to your year.

Let me be honest: the year will be a challenge, and there will be hardship. Amid endless practice tests and the burden of expectations, you may wonder whether all this effort is worth it. I felt the same. What enabled me to endure was not talent but a combination of two things: a clear commitment and a fairly simple routine. I promised myself to study three hours every evening, no exception, and I went to bed at the same time every night. Essentially, the routine became the foundation that held everything else together. On bad days, I did not have to decide whether to study; the decision had already been made.

You will also meet circumstances you cannot control. A classmate of mine fell ill two weeks before the exam, and by coincidence, it was the same week her parents moved house. She did not blame fate. She simply adjusted her plan and did what she could. Fortunately, she passed, but even if she had not, she would have deserved respect for facing the situation with dignity.

Finally, remember that your existence is not defined by a score. Fame and glory are not the point. Harmony between your effort and your health is. Treat yourself with the goodness you would show a good friend. You have been granted a year to grow, and whatever the consequence, that is a blessing. Good luck. Your senior, Chia-hao
